saying; "I tell you I am certain of it. Uld is a favorite; some one who is always poking about; some one I hate," said the orator, rising n eloquence and indignation as he went on.

"Do you mean Sidney Grey?" said one and another; "but that's not a bit likely. He is lame; he could not follow us about; and, besides, he was at home ill the day it happened."

"Oh! don't tell me," said Wycombe; "can't people sham being ill? Can't people hide in ses, and peep out at windows? Is not Dudding's house close to the apple-woman's stall? Is not Grey always going there? and is it not as likely as not that he was looking out of a window, and saw us when we knocked the stall over and belped ourselves to the apples?"

"I say, I say, I say," cried a little boy, eager to throw in his mite of information; "this morning I saw Sidney Grey speaking to the apple woman, and I believe he gave her a shilling."
"There now, did not I tell you?" cried Wycombe, enchanted with such a decided piece of evidence. "There's a fellow for you! there's a sneak! Gets the whole story out of the apple woman, and comes straight off here, and tells

"But the Doctor knew last night," objected some provokingly reasonable person.

"Oh! don't tell me," said Wycombe ; "what is the use of talking? We are all to be caned on Thursday; and we have been spied upon and teil-taled about; and I say that the spy and the tell-tale is Sidney Grey; contradict me if you

But the risk of contradicting Wycombe was what no one liked; so, having proved his opinion to his own satisfaction, and exhausted his powers of eloquence, he wiped his hot face with his handkerchief, and sauntered down the playground in search of some little boy to tease; suspicion and dislike sown in his mind, and ca h saying to himself, "Well, to be sure, one neve: knows the truth about any one. Who would have thought of Sidney Grey turning out a spy

In a quieter part of the playground Lyon was walking slowly beside Sidney, reading to him a copy of verses, which he himself considered to be "not so very bad," and which his friends Collins, Foster, and Harding had pronounced to be stunning. Sidney's praise was more discriminating, and Lyon valued it accordingly. As he finished his last and best line he looked up for applause; but he had the mortification to see that Sidney was not attending -he was listening to some noise that came from a crowd of small boys at the bottom of the playground. "Hark !" he said ; "there is some one crying

"Oh! never mind," said Lyon; "it is only the usual row that goes on whenever the cake woman comes. I should have thought you would be used to it after being here six weeks. It's only Wycombe, and King, and half-a-dozen more, amusing themselves by levying black mail-bullying the little fellows out of half their toffee and fruit. Sometimes one or two, with a Folly could not know what we do in the town unless some one told him. Martin see us indeed! Martin is as blind as a bettle. No, no; don't tell"—

"I don't think any one dare sneak," said one of the bystanders. "Lyon would not trouble himself to tell tales of us, and the others dare not."
